Wonder

A Golden Shovel Poem after L.M. Montgomery's "The Gable Window"

Curtains fluttering in summer breezes framed it, that long-ago portal of dreams that opened on prairie horizons. I sat beside it, on lazy afternoons and starlit nights, envisioning a path out and away to all the corners of a wide world of possibility. And now, miles and years away, I dream of that distant window and its horizons of wonder.

Imagine a World

Imagine a world
where red roads wind through whispering fields and along the azure sigh of the sea.

Imagine a world
where cherry blossoms birth marble halls, white things flit in a Haunted Wood, and dryads laugh beside the spring.

Imagine a world
of broken slates,

mice perishing in pudding sauce, ridgepole dares and forgotten flour in cakes.

Imagine a world
where Octobers are blessings in themselves, tomorrows are always free of mistakes, and bends in roads abound.

Imagine a world of hopes and dreams
and home.

Imagine yourself in the world of Green Gables, among kindred spirits,
and you'll never be alone.

Winter Forest

"I had a vision of woodland solitudes of snow, arcades picked out in pearl and silver ..."
—L.M. Montgomery, "The Woods in Winter"

I stand at forest's edge in crisp moonlight where arches trimmed in pearl and silver gleam.
Their mystery and magic beckon me despite the chill of this black winter night, and I elect the path beneath the dream they weave of stars and glinting snow and tree.
It is a mystic realm where time stands still, where branches, frost, and moon together seem a great cathedral dome in filigree, where searching souls find peace and each heart will be free.

Valancy’s October

“Never had she imagined anything so splendid. A great, tinted peace.”
—The Blue Castle*, Chapter XXXI, by L.M. Montgomery* clouds’ shadows race rivers of colours and dreams stormy winds swirl autumn’s palette paint October moods great tinted peace

Moonlight’s Rightful Home

A Golden Shovel Poem after The Blue Castle*, Chapter XX, by L.M. Montgomery*

Moonlight has slipped into her orbit, though she does not yet know her rightful name. It was providence, destiny, all some unfathomable part of the ebb and flow of the tides, the turning of pages in a story she didn’t know she wrote, a stone in the foundation of her dreams. A comet of freedom carried her along, rushing her towards independence and home, gloriously building her Blue Castle through choices, at last, of her own. And on the solitary road, out of gas on the night of the dance, she feels the first realization of love, of Moonlight’s rightful home in space.

Fireshine and Shadow

Inspired by Anne of Green Gables*, Chapter XXX, by L.M. Montgomery*

One builds her castles in the air beside the glowing embers' light.
The other watches from her chair with tenderness of heart alight as dull dusk fades and blurs to night.
This girl is hers because of chance, and love shines through her fading sight as fireshine and shadow dance.
